Preface

In 2004, as a student of the University of Alberta, Faculty of Law, I enrolled in an upper-year offering entitled Personal Property Security Law. That course, masterfully taught by Professor Roderick J. Wood, changed the direction of my path in law. The structure and cohesion of the Personal Property Security Act (PPSA) contrasted sharply with the judge-made doctrine I had grown accustomed to in the first-year private law courses, namely contracts, property and torts. Coming from a background in mathematics, I found comfort in the clarity, certainty and sound conceptual framework provided by this modern commercial statute. Like doing arithmetic, applying the PPSA's provisions was intellectually pleasing. It required discipline and technical mastery, but the statute furnished a direct analytical path to a predictable legal outcome in almost every instance. I became captivated by the PPSA and have since made it a major focus of my private and academic practice.

I became a faculty member of the University of Saskatchewan, College of Law in 2014. It has been wonderful returning home to Saskatchewan to teach a new generation of lawyers and jurists at the province's only law school, a venerated institution with over a century of history and tradition. During my time at the College, I have had the privilege of working alongside my mentor and friend, Professor Ronald C.C. Cumming. Upon my arrival, he graciously allowed me to take over his course on Personal Property Security Law, even sharing his detailed course materials. Over his decorated academic career, spanning well over fifty years, Professor Cumming has taught successive generations of prominent personal property security law jurists. His students include, among many others, Professor Tamara M. Buckwold (a member of my doctoral advisory committee), Justice Georgina R. Jackson, Justice Donald H. Layh (a long-time family friend and my former employer) and Professor Roderick J. Wood (my law professor and doctoral supervisor). Indeed, I have had the good fortune of learning both directly and indirectly from multiple generations of leading secured finance experts.

This book is the culmination of seventeen years of study, practice, scholarship, pedagogy and reflection. I am grateful to those I have encountered over the years who have sharpened my skills, and deepened and broadened my understanding of personal property security law. In addition to the individuals I have already mentioned, this list includes (formal titles omitted) Ross Bentley, Barbara Billingsley, Anthony Duggan, John Eamon, Pat Finnerty, Brock Gibson, Ronald Mann, Daniel McLeod, Jacqueline Moore, Chuck Russell, Chad

Cyber Liability and Cyber Insurance

Schneider, Catherine Walsh, Scott Watson, and the members of the Canadian Conference on Personal Property Security Law.

Special thanks go to those individuals who have devoted substantial time and effort to reviewing and commenting on the book's chapters, namely (formal titles omitted) Marek Coutu, Ronald Cuming, Latoya Farrell, Evan Hutchison, Cory Kapeller, Nicole Krupski, Donald Layh, Braeden Pivnick, Scott Watson and Laura Wolfe. Your collective feedback has improved the work immeasurably.

Finally, sincerest thanks to my editor, Cheryl Finch. Your attention to detail and helpful suggestions have greatly enhanced the book.
